Meeting of Its Stockholders and Board of Directors Yesterday-Outline of the Structure's Interior-A Regular Bonanza for the Gentlemen Interested.

The Grand Opera-house stockholders, also the Board of Directors for the same enterprise, held a meeting yesterday morning.

It was an important conference, as de termining that the institution for which Memphis has sighed for years, will be hurried to speedy consummation.

These instructions will be only too cheerfully complied with.

An Appeal reporter was shown sketches of the building's interior, the front eleva-tion of which has yet to be drawn. While the drawings referred to may be the foundation for the general interior ar-rangement, they were hurriedly drawn, in the rough, and not finally accepted. A publication of them would, therefore, be

The sketches showed a scating capacity of 2,000, including the twenty-five private boxes for use of the stockholders. These boxes are located in the orchestra circle, extending across the two central divisions, occupying space of the third and dourth rows. They are mere reservations for four people, enclosed by brass railings about as high as the chairs. The proscenium boxes, as shown in the sketches, are eight in number, situated in the usual are eight in number, situated in the usual place, but of a very handsome design. Some firms possess a great many advantages which are impossible for others to acquire. For instance, one firm will have larger capital which enables them to purchase for cash and in quantities large enough to get the lowest prices and the smallest rate of freight, besides the advantages there are from those who manufacture their own goods and in this way save the profit usually paid to middle men. All of this is true of the Armstrong Furniture Company, of 272 Second street, who manufacture their furnitare at Evansville, lad., and make their shipments when the competition in freight rates is distressingly low; therefore they are able to sell all goods in their line at lower prices than any house in the city.
